Administrative History

The David Suzuki Foundation (DSF) is a science-based non-profit environmental organization headquartered in Vancouver, British Columbia, with offices in Montreal and Toronto. Incorporated in September 1990, it was established as a federally registered Canadian charity in January 1991. The DSF can trace its origins to 1989, the same year the CBC aired a radio series by Dr. David Suzuki entitled It's a Matter of Survival – a book based on the series and co-authored by Dr. Suzuki was published in 1990. Both the series and the book described how the "first global scientific consensus" that the world was "entering an era of unprecedented climate change" had emerged at the 1988 Toronto Conference on the Changing Atmosphere. A 1989 meeting organized by Dr. Suzuki and his wife Dr. Tara Cullis with a dozen invited guests who wanted to work towards reversing global climate change led directly to the establishment of the Foundation. Dr. Suzuki stepped down from the DSF Board of Directors in April 2012 – Dr. Cullis has been president of the DSF Board since 1993.

The Foundation's goals are to investigate, communicate and support work that balances "human needs" with the planet's capacity to "sustain all life". The DSF's work is focused on Canada and Canadian issues, and from 1989-1994 and 2005-2006 included international environmental projects. Main areas of concern include the protection of the climate, transformation of the economy, encouraging a reconnection with nature, and community-building. The DSF publishes information related to their advocacy work through newsletters, scientific studies, research reports, books, information kits, brochures, and news releases.

Scope and Content

Fonds consists of materials created by the David Suzuki Foundation, its staff and hired consultants, in the course of and in support of its work. It includes published reports commissioned by the DSF, and audiovisual recordings in a variety of formats documenting the DSF's research, advocacy, and outreach programmes.
